

Wear whatever you want, but be sure to wear things you can move fast in. Non-restrictive clothing, shoes you can run in, etc. in case of crisis.

Don't attend events alone. Bring a buddy and have a safety plan with them. Tell someone who won't be with you your plans, and notify them if plans change.

Identifying violence to a crowd can deter it, and provide intimidation to an attacker as a growing number of people are made aware to their crimes. Be loud, make a scene, and distract, because often the best way to disrupt a dispute has no physical requirements.

EVENT SAFETY

 Bring self defense items, but make sure they are legal and permitted at the event you are attending.

Be aware of your surrounding, look for 24 hour public spaces you can find safety in if need be.

Making sure you are hydrated, your body is nourished, and your skin is protected is just as important as personal safety. On hot days, rest in the shade and watch you and your friends for symptoms of sun stroke and heat exhaustion.

We are not in the right climate to be getting up in hecklers/street preachers/protesters faces. They could easily have weapons and are looking for an excuse to escalate things.

Charge electronics, and bring power-banks/extra batteries. Write down phone numbers in case your phone gets lost or dies.

If witnessing police violence, you can record, observe, and verbally intervene, but physically intervening is illegal. Get the names, badges and car numbers of the officers involved.

Designate a SOBER buddy. It doesn't matter if none of you drove yourselves, you need someone who is keeping an eye out and thinking critically about safety.

Trust your instincts. If you get a bad feeling, listen to it. The phrase "better safe than sorry" is never more important than now.

Designate a Primary and Secondary emergency meeting point away from event grounds for you and your event buddies. It should be away from where most of the activity is, out of the line-of-sight, yet still close. In an opposite direction of where you think higher population is.

You should know these primary and secondary locations and be able to find them without your phones.
